GLOBAL POINTS OF PROGRESS - United States: A Denver program that dispatches health care workers instead of police to respond to low-level, nonviolent incidents has completed its first six months. The Support Team Assisted Response program, or STAR, sent a mental health professional and paramedic to 748 incidents, including trespassing and welfare checks, none of which resulted in police intervention or arrests. Operators flagged more than 2,500 calls as eligible for the alternative response, representing close to 3% of 911 calls, according to STAR's recent progress report. The program offers a more compassionate approach to policing, advocates say, keeping nonviolent offenders - who are often in need of social services - out of the criminal justice system.
