GLOBAL POINTS OF PROGRESS - Tunisia: In a move hailed by anti-racism advocates, a Tunisian court will allow a man to change his name to remove a word associated with slavery. "Atig" - or "liberated by" - is a common part of many family names in Tunisia, having once been used to denote a freed slave from people still in bondage. Black Tunisians make up 10%-15% of the population, and although the country was among the first to abolish slavery in 1846, critics say the government has done little to acknowledge the discrimination descendants face, including unequal employment opportunities and racial stereotypes in the media. The ruling will open doors, activists say, for other Black Tunisians to shed the stigmatized label.

You will be able to view the works after the show as well, but we would love to have you experience it live! You can give comments throughout the show and you will see so many students represented.
