GLOBAL POINTS OF PROGRESS - Mexico: A leveled tract of the Monarch Butterfly Biosphere Reserve is sprouting back to life thanks to calculated local reforestation efforts. Illegal logging - responsible for much of the region's forest loss - decimated a 25-acre segment of the reserve in 2015. Hoping to save the area that monarch butterflies call home each winter, researchers embarked on a reforestation plan - and were surprised by their own success. Over 80% of the new trees survived, while previous government reforestation programs saw survival rates of between 10% and 35%.
